FORT GRISWOLD.

A Tale of the American Revolution.

BY JOSEPH BOUGHTON, ESQ.

CHAPTER I.

It was upon an afternoon in June—the sun was majestically coursing down the west, and the horizon was bright with his rich descending glories. The sparkling Thames rolled quietly onward to its peaceful meeting with the waves of the Sound, which lay to the south, and whose bright waters gleamed in the golden sunlight like a burnished shield, while its broad bosom mirrored forth the rosy clouds and the deep blue sky above. The air was vocal with the songs of birds, and fragrant with the perfume of a thousand flowers. Within a rustic bower that crowned a gentle hill-top, surrounded by luxuriant shrubs, and overlooking the river, sat a beautiful girl, holding in her hand a richly embroidered military sash, which she had just finished. A smile of pleasure curled her beautiful lip, as she held it up and exclaimed—

'Ah, this will well become my hero lover. He will wear it for my sake. And William, will he not love me the more for this beautiful token? But why don't the truant come? He should have been here ere now.'

A light step was heard without, and Mary Edmonds rose, and eagerly hastened to meet the comer. At the threshold she encountered, not her expected William, but a handsome young officer, wearing the British uniform. She blushed deeply with surprise and disappointment, and bashfully hung her head, as the officer led her to a seat within the bower.

'Is it you, Colonel Wilton?' exclaimed Mary, 'I thought, since the death of your cousin Andre, you found no time to absent yourself from your commander, General Clinton.'

'Love is ever fruitful in expedients, my sweet Mary—and I have left the camp once more to visit you, and frankly to ask your hand. I love you, Mary,' added Wilton, sinking upon his knee at her feet—'and will make you mine, if you will become so. Say but the word, and to-morrow shall witness our nuptials, and you shall return to New York with me.'

Mary was truly embarrassed. Wilton's manner savored so much of confidence in his suit, that it was with confidence she could summon a reply.

'Rise, Colonel Wilton,' she said, at length, 'I esteem you highly as a friend—nay, I may say, as I would a brother—but—'

'Mary!'—

'Love another'

Wilton rose calmly, and taking her hand, said—'I thank you, Mary, for this frankness and this confidence in me, though the thought is a bitter one, that you are to be another's. Nay, now that I reflect upon it, it was madness in me to suppose you would not give your preference to some young American. Neither could I expect, that your uncle and guardian, Colonel Ledyard, (who is also a distant kinsman to me, Mary,) would sanction your union with me, so long as this war continues. But will you not further give me your confidence? tell me who is the happy possessor of your heart?'

'There he stands,' replied Mary, pointing to the entrance.

Wilton turned round to behold him.

'What—Lieutenant William De Hotman! Your hand, my dear fellow!' exclaimed Wilton, blushing to the temples at his situation. 'You are right, Mary,' he added, after regaining his composure, 'Do Hotman deserves all your love—and Heaven forbid I should wrong him, who once preserved my life, when I was captured by a scouring party of American soldiers. Do you remember that, my noble boy? Yes, Mary, you are perfectly right. God bless you both. Farewell!' and Wilton hastened from the bower—and soon the tramp of his horse was heard bearing him upon the road.

'What, Mary,' said De Hotman, smiling, 'did the young British officer offer to surrender the citadel of his heart to you?'

'Did you not hear him?' responded Mary.

'Yes, Mary—I was the witness of all that passed, and of all that Wilton said. He had but just entered the bower, when I came up. And so, you had the courage to tell him you loved another. Ten thousand thanks, my sweet girl, for that, and for what I saw. You were frank and gentle, and not coquettish.'

'I am proud of your praises, William, since you have yourself witnessed that I have deserved them. But, see, I have a present for you, added she, adjusting the sash, she had wrought, upon De Hotman's uniform.

'Thanks, again, my gentle Mary,' said De Hotman, imprinting a kiss upon the forehead of the fair donor—'I will wear this favor with the same pleasure as did the knights of old, the braided tresses of their ladye—loves—and if danger ever threatens the giver, your soldier will die to protect and to save you.'

'But do you think, Willian, it could ever happen during this war, that I should require the fulfilment of your last promise?'

'I pray not, Mary—yet, if you lived within the range of the ravages of that villain, traitor, Arnold, it might indeed be necessary. Have you not learned, Mary, of his bloody spoliations in Virginia? It is a foul blot upon Connecticut that she ever gave birth to such a monster.'

'Heaven defend our village of New London from his fangs!' ejaculated Mary.

'It is to defend it, Mary, that we have erected Forts Trumbull and Griswold, and garrisoned the latter under the command of the brave Colonel Ledyard, whose Lieutenant I am. No danger threatens us as long as Washington remains so near us, but a change is present quarters, would leave us open to attack.'

Twilight had now fallen over the landscape and the river—hushed were the songs of the birds, and closed the petals of the blossoms. Leaning on the arm of Lieut. De Hotman, Mary went from the bower to her home, the residence of Colonel Ledyard. How long the young soldier lingered upon the doorstone—how often the parting kiss, and the salutation, 'good night,' were repeated, the experience of many of my readers can pretty accurately determine.

CHAPTER II.

Upon an evening, at the close of the summer, in the year 1781, Sir Henry Clinton had assembled around him his generals, and other officers of his army, for the purpose of devising plans against an expected attack of the American army upon the city of New York.

'You are aware, gentlemen,' said Sir Henry, 'that the rebel Commander has for some weeks been preparing to attack our garrison, and recover the city. A prudent as well as a brave soldier, is Washington, and we must expect no child's play in this affair. The chances would have been against us, but for the recent arrival of our three thousand Germans, which is a timely addition indeed. What say you, General Knyphausen?' continued the British Commander, addressing that officer, 'do you think your countrymen will fill the same number of Cornwallis's British troops, which, but for the arrival of the Germans. I should have retained?'

'Ah, Sheneral Clinton, indeed vill dey. You vill see, Sheneral, dat my prave Shermans vill make no ting of peating dese tam rebel Yankees, and den eat dem up, if necessary, afterwards.'

'No doubt of it;' interrupted Colonel Wilton, who was one of Sir Henry's staff, 'and if they are likely to fail in a regular onset, let them sputter Dutch at them, and, my word for it, they'll carry the day.'

'Wilton!' exclaimed Sir Henry, endeavoring to call up a frown at the waggish young officers, while he bit his lip in vain to keep down the laughter that was rising at this remark, and in which the other officers joined. Wilton bowed, as his superior pronounced his name, and lifting a mock-humble eye at his commander, saw in his no further reprimand. Sir Henry then turned to Knyphausen, and said.

No doubt your countrymen are brave, General—but you know the old adage, 'the proof of the pudding, &c.' and this expected descent of Washington upon us, I apprehend, will put to the test the bravery of both English and Germans. The rebel's movements are already a little crafty. He has broken up his camp at New Windsor, and crossed the Hudson into New Jersey, with the view, I learn, to draw me from the fortifications here, so as to give me battle in the open field.'

'Ha!' said Knyphausen, 'catch a vesel ashleep, vould he? If I might advise you, Sir Henry, I vould stay at home here. If de rebels vants de city, let him come and take it, if he can.'

'Why General Knyphausen,' said Colonel Wilton, 'your brave Germans wouldn't like to be mewed up here in the garrison, when there's fighting to be had in the field, would they? I judged from your description, that they were anxious to make a meal of these 'tam rebel Yankees,' as you call them.'

Sir Henry shook his head at Wilton, and Knyphausen, by this time comprehending the force of taunt, turned upon Wilton with a look that seemed to threaten to make a meal of him. He was proceeding to vent his wrath in his accustomed jargon, when a messenger entered the room, with despatches to the commander from Lord Cornwallis.

Sir Henry hastily opened one of the letters, and during the perusal, his countenance exhibited feelings of extreme perplexity and mortification. At the conclusion he crumpled the letter in his hand, and furiously strode the apartment. At length he exclaimed—

'What a dolt I am! the arched rebel has indeed "caught a weasel asleep," General Knyphausen!' So saying, he unfolded letter, and read from it aloud, as follows—

YORKTOWN, August 30, 1781.

'You have been egregiously misled, General Clinton—and our intended movements in this campaign are completely baffled. Your last letters have informed me that Washington contemplated an attack upon New York, and all his recent movements pointed that way. Presuming such to be his determination, and knowing, that in carrying it out, he would necessarily have to employ almost all his entire army, thereby withdrawing troops from almost every other point, I expected no molestation from him, in my movements here. Undisturbed by him, I could in a few months have invested the entire south, and thus brought to subjection its whole people. In the meantime I felt assured that Washington in his attempt upon New York, would experience a total rout, which would probably put an end to this war, and fully establish the success of His Majesty's arms over the revolted colonies. Judge then, of my surprise and disappointment, upon learning that Washington had crossed the Delaware with his army, and had proceeded with Count de Roqhambeau, to join Lafayette at Williamsburg. In addition to this the Count de Grasse has arrived with twenty-five sail, and by the orders of Washington, has blocked up the mouth of York and James rivers, thus cutting off all communication between Yorktown and New York. His movements have also thwarted, and rendered of no avail, the efforts of the British fleet under Admiral Graves. I am confident that the rebels and their allies contemplate a regular siege upon me here. Count de Baras, with his French squadron, has succeeded in landing artillery from Rhode Island, and other preparations are being made, which convince me of such a design. Lafayette has also received an additional reinforcement of 3000 troops, under the Marquis de St. Simon, who came up the river in boats, and has joined him at Williamsburg. Thus menaced, I have thought it prudent to abandon my outposts and defences, and have withdrawn entirely within the fortifications here at Yorktown. Closely invested, as you perceive I am, it would be madness to attempt leaving the fortifications, and endeavor to proceed by rapid marches to New York. Having thus represented to you my present condition, I now require the embarkation of sufficient of your troops from New York, for my relief. Let them be sent speedily—and I doubt not the consequence will be an open engagement, that will redound to the triumph of the British arms—and probably end the rebellion. CORNWALLIS.

'Yorktown invested!' exclaimed several officers.

'So it appears,' replied Sir Henry, 'and preparations must be made for sending troops to its relief. Fool that I was to credit the story of the design to attack us here.'

'Ah, dat vould have been a pad pizness for de rebels—dey knew better dan dat' said Knyphausen.

'So there's no fighting to take place here, after all,' remarked Colonel Wilton—'General Knyphausen, your soldiers will starve, won't they?'

'Vy, bow should dey starve?' inquired Knyphausen.

'Why, as the prospect is, they'll have no Yankees to eat 'very soon.'

'Silence, Wilton!' said Sir Henry, somewhat sternly—'this is no time for jests that provoke ill-nature. There is much to be done, and your troops, General Knyphausen, will not remain idle. I shall probably soon embark with them and some of my English troops to the relief of Yorktown. In the mean time, gentlemen,' continued Sir Henry, addressing his assembled officers, 'I have a project, which I mean to set on foot, immediately. It is a plan to draw off some of the forces which now threaten Cornwallis, by an expedition against New London. Such a ruse may be equal to the one which Washington has already played off upon me—and if it succeeds, Cornwallis will himself be a sufficient match for those that remain at Yorktown, while our troops here can come to an engagement with those whom we have thus withdrawn to the defence of New London. You, General Arnold, I have selected to command this expedition.'

That officer had been sitting, listening in moody silence to the previous conversation. Finding himself addressed, he rose, advanced to the table, and bowed to the British Commander, in acknowledgement of the duty which the latter intended to put upon him. The light of the lamp fell upon his face. It was pale, and even haggard—and his forehead, once smooth and polished, now exhibited a deep quiet-worn furrow.—Treason has changed him to tiger—His hand was red with the blood of his Virginian murder and rapine. His lip curled with fearful and malevolent satisfaction, as he replied—

'I joyfully accept the command of this expedition, General Clinton, and care not how soon I renew my hitherto successful spoliations upon this accursed land!'

'No doubt you are as ready to revel in the blood of your native State, as the viper is to sting the bosom that warms him into life!' sneeringly remarked Wilton, whose noble nature made him heartly despise the traitor.

'Ha!' exclaimed Arnold, turning suddenly around, and putting his hand to the hilt of his sword, 'this insult, young sir, unless apologized for, shall be wiped out with blood!' and his lips trembled with guilty emotion.

'Not with my blood, unless you mean to murder me, which is quite probable,' replied Wilton, 'I shall never stoop to a duel with a wretch like you. There is already a stain upon your soul, which the ocean cannot wash away—a d—d spot, that will never 'out,' but will sooner 'the multitudinous seas incarnadine!' and the eye of Wilton flashed upon Arnold a look of withering contempt and defiance.

WASHINGTON CITY

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1841.

THE EVENING (Albany) JOURNAL AND THE MADISONIAN.

The Journal says—

'Immediately after Congress assembled, the men sent to Washington as scavengers to the Herald, were taken into Executive favor and confidence, and were to be met at all times in the drawing room, and at breakfast and tea table of the President.—Albany Evening Journal.

The Madisonian editors deny this in toto

Whether it be true or not, certain it is, that the Herald published every thing of importance to the letter that did come to pass in relation to the President, long in advance, which is doing the President very little honor. If he wishes to be more unpopular than he is with the people, let him pay those incendiary papers—[we were going to say the Madisonian was one.] The editor has doubtless been raised to the honor of chief knight of the kitchen.

A scavenger may be an honest man, which is more than can be said of pimps and spies. The white house was provided by high minded honorable men, for the reception of their chief magistrate, and if he turns it into a receptacle of pimps and spies, and low political gamblers—he is unworthy of the office he holds. That Mr. Tyler, a once proud, high minded Virginian, should unbosom himself to any one, to say nothing of low pimps, is what we never expected!

Some do suspect his son for conveying information out of the house. We can only say that the President has discovered more ways than one for displaying his consistency, "his delicate scruples," or what you please, proving that his "opinions" are not quite as steadfast as the rock of ages.

Now the long and the short of the matter is this—that whoever trusts a traitor is sure to be betrayed, as we have seen. The President had sense enough to know this, so that the thing looks suspicious on all sides, and making every allowance for it would seem that he actually wanted courage to break the ice to the people himself.

THE MADISONIAN AGAIN.

The following is from the same paper of September 23d.

FROM THE MADISONIAN.

A QUESTION FOR THE COUNTRY TO DECIDE.

WHAT constitutes a Whig? Is it that habit of thought which even regards the people as at the foundation of all government, and which believes that all government is but an expression of their sovereign will? Is Whigism to be evinced in that republican manner which carries into the high place of official—

As to what constitutes a Whig is not the question before the people. The question is, that Whigs, so called, have betrayed their country, and we should say that the PEOPLE, as the PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, without regard to names, know their own business best, and will not thank the writer for manufacturing questions—opinions to be rammed down their throats—they can think for themselves. A fine compliment to their understanding, truly, to suppose they can be influenced by those who have openly proved themselves guilty of treachery—not so the people.

His "habit of thought which even regards the people as at the foundation of all government." Wonderfully condescending this!!!! He admits as a special favor that "even" if it were true, that the people are the foundation "of all government!!" &c. and are they not? The people are the foundation of all organized governments on the globe—but usurpers have in many instances, by midnight, plots treason and duplicity, encroached upon their rights, and this writer is nothing more than a paid agent in the same unholy cause. His true "habit of thought" is to get money, and no true friend to his country ought to patronise him. He must be more than an idiot to think the people can be gulled by such a jargon—a column or so telling the people what "Whigism" is—torturing the English language into any thing but common sense—not a word of reason nor argument in the whole of it. The people can see as far as he can.

The fact that the President, through the influence of his "friends," we presume, has made this shuffling turn-coat politician his organ, is a bad set out for a second term—and the same of his successor, which every man can see from the Massachusetts papers, and some of their members in Congress—is Secretary W. Not but Mr. Webster would make a good President, [in our opinion,] but were he even brought forward in an honorable way, [instead of this underhanded movement, if such be the case,] it is ten to one if he would get a vote in the western and southern States.

But the people have gained wisdom from experience, and will take the business of President making in their own hands.

Hark to the Madisonian. "Federal Banking"—the very words of the office holder party.

The editor will be very apt to have his "lion's skin" stripped off by the corps.

But it is quite too soon to agitate the question yet, and we merely wish to apprise the people of what is going on as a faithful sentinel, let them judge for themselves.

CLERKS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL'S BUREAU.

John Marron, Esq. Chief Clerk of the Bureau, has been in the department some years, but we never had the pleasure to see him till a few days since. He is of good height, rather spare, but very engaging figure, and in the prime of life. His face is Grecian, with dark, thin, keen features, and a piercing black eye. His countenance is versatile, changing from gay to grave, generally the latter, but indicates good sense, and has every mark of a keen, shrewd, business man. In his manners Mr. M. is genteel and distant. He is a native of Ireland.

Mr. James Lawrenson. Mr. L. has been in office some time, but we never saw him before. He is somewhere about middle age, of average height, common size, and handsome shape. His face is rather oval, well featured and fair, with a fine mild blue eye, of much expression. His countenance is open and bland, and flows with the milk of human kindness. His manners are affable and uncommonly pleasing. He is a native of England.

Mr. De LeDran Mr. D. is a new clerk, quite a young man, and of very imposing appearance. He is a tall, stout, showy figure, with an ovel, full face, and regular, manly features. His fine full eye is of a light hazel, benign and glowing, with a smooth, high forehead, and soft, arched brow. His countenance is open, mild and benevolent, and his manners are uncommonly smooth and winning. Mr. D. is from Broom county, N. Y.

Wm. P. Young, Esq. Mr. Y. is in the prime of life, of good height, rather slender, but very neat, agile figure. His face is round, with regular, pleasing features, of the middling shade—rather thin, with a soft, liquid blue eye, an intelligent forehead, and an open, manly countenance, of much mildness and benignity. In his manners Mr. Young has all the grace and suavity of a thorough southern gentleman. He is a native of Virginia, and just appointed.

John Furgusson, Esq. Mr. F. has been in the department some time, but we never saw him till quite recently. He is of good height, and rather slender in size, but has a neatly turned figure. His face is oval, fair, and very pleasing, and our notes say "with a fine, full, ingenuous eye," no color named. Imagination can however, easily supply the place. Say "a bright blue," or "a brilliant hazel, full of dancing cupids, or any thing equivalent to his highly chivalrous name.

Our impression is, they are a dark grey. His countenance is mild, social and studious, and his manners are bland and courteous. Mr. F. is from the State of Ohio.

Horatio King, Esq. Mr. King is a young man, but not one of the new clerks. He is rather tall and spare, with a good, elastic figure, an oval, fair face, with keen, thin features. His eye is large, of a bright sky blue, full of life and energy, and his forehead betokens a man of mind, being deep and smooth. His countenance is open, gay and generous, and his manners are frank and manly.

Mr. King is a gentleman of some literary reputation—was once editor of a newspaper, and did us the honor to exchange.

We have now before us an oration delivered by Mr. K. 4th of last July, before the "Union Literary Society" of this city, which does him much honor, and goes to show a man of talent and reading. May he go on and prosper. He is a native of Maine.

Mr. E. H. Metcalf. Mr. M. is quite a young man, of good height, rather stout, with a well turned figure. His face is oval, with a remarkably fine forehead, and a most enchanting blue eye, mild and steady, with corresponding features. His countenance is open and luminous, and bespeaks much good nature and good sense. In his manners Mr. M. is genteel. He is a new clerk, but we cannot say which State he hails from.

Mr. John M. Hollis. Mr. H. is a young man, with a fine, tall, stout, showy figure, and a round, fair face, very interesting features—a good, smooth forehead, and a soft, modest blue eye, full and expressive, and his countenance is open, intelligent and pleasing, while his manners are manly and affable. He is a new clerk, but his place of birth is not mentioned.

G. A. Bohrer. Mr. B. is likewise a young man, and makes a very pleasing appearance. His face is Grecian, with very expressive manly features. His eye is black, full and handsome, with an open, ingenuous countenance, and of very gentlemanly manners. From the hurry of the moment, or some oversight, his height is not named—and from the same cause some of the other sketches may be imperfect. If so, we shall take pleasure in correcting them.

Mr. Charles H. Mitteregger, [pronounced Mittericer.] This is quite a youth—certainly not grown, though he is about six feet in height, with a figure of the finest Kentucky mould, though a native of New York. His face is oval and full, of a rich carnation glow, while his features are of the most exact symmetry, with a calm, full blue eye, and soft brow. His countenance is open and benign, and glows with all the energy of youthful, manly pride. His manners are modest and uncommonly winning.

He is attached to the State Department, and of right ought to have been mentioned last week.

THE VETO.

"Solitary and alone we put this [veto] ball in motion." It will soon raise the drooping spirits of the country to find this dangerous monster is to be strangled by the people; ere its IRON FANGS HAVE REACHED OUR HEART'S BLOOD, ALL THAT IS LEFT TO FREEMEN.

HUMOUROUS.

TO THE Editor OF THE TRANSCRIPT—SIR: As the MECHANICS' EXHIBITION is about to open the public must naturally feel interested to know what will constitute the chief attraction among so many choice specimens of American ingenuity.

Having stolen a peep at the collection by looking through a key hole, I take the liberty of specifying a few of the most rare and prominent article now in Quincy Hall, and the names of the ingenious workmen who are supposed most anxious to secure the premiums.

Mr. TYLER, Cabinet Maker, at the South End, has sent two fine specimens of his PATENT VETO STUMBLING BLOCKS, designed to stop a locomotive at full speed. In a letter accompanying the articles, Mr. T states them to be made of genuine AMERICAN live oak, but the committee are of opinion that they are nothing more than sappy Virginia dogwood. It is doubted, moreover, whether they will work well, as nobody knows what may happen when passengers get their steam up. However, Mr. T. quotes an old Roman in his support, and says he will 'take the responsibility!'

N. B Mr. Tyler has removed from Harrison Avenue to the bridge that carries a man over.

Mr. CALHOUN, Yarn spinner and Weaver, No. 1, Nullification Corner, has sent a yard and a half of fine changeable silk, in the manufacture of which article he has always held the first rank. The specimen in question is so admirably colored, that sometimes it appears black, sometimes white, sometimes true blue, sometimes goslin green—and sometimes invisible cerulean, just as the wind shifts. It never remains long of one color, but will change from pepper and salt to thunder and lightning, in the twinkling of an eye. The true secret of this wonderful versatility of hue, seems to be that it was never dyed in the wool. The work, moreover, is wrought in damask, with figures representing a masquerade, in which the position of every person is so well defined that it is impossible to tell which way he is moving. This piece of manufacture shows considerable sleight of hand, but I think it of too little use to be included in the AMERICAN SYSTEM.

Mr. V. BUREN. Gentleman Farmer, of the interior, has sent a pot of his best sour krout, made from Kinderhook cabbage. He recommends it as an excellent diet for dyspeptical subjects who have over eaten themselves on treasury pap, especially when their sufferings is intolerable. Mr. V. B. has also transmitted several stupendous cabbage heads, from which the committee have selected the 'greatest and best,' and pronounce it a very great cabbage head indeed.

Mr. BENTON, Apothecary, corner of Rag-Fair and Shin-bone Alley, has sent a bottle of his mint-drops, the components of which he states to be chiefly Gum RHINO and aurum potabile. There appears, however, to be little in the preparation besides pure gum. A pair of yellow birds were sent with the drops, but flew away in a day or two, for want of a cage. The committee did not think them worth the catching.

Messrs. WOODBURY & Co., Shingle splitters, formerly of Washington street, sent a lot of newly invented sub-treasury butter boxes, in confident expectation of the premium gold medal. These butter boxes were made at great expense, strongly lined with 'blanks, paper, and twine,' and stamped 'everlasting,' but they unfortunately fell to pieces on being touched. The committee therefore pronounce Messrs. W. & Co.'s invention a 'total failure,' but contemplate awarding these gentlemen the second best leather medal as an indemnity—and advise them not to 'try again.'

The SOCIETY OF PRACTICAL ABSTRACTIONISTS, in No Man's Land, have sent a beautiful model of the frigate Constitution, with her bows in the stern, according to an improved plan, designed to procure plenty of lee way in working to the windward.—Accompanying the improved Constitution is a newly invented nautical instrument, called the Convergent Radiating Parallel, being a Virginia invention for finding the corner of a circle.' The committee have placed this in the Rotunda.

The above are only a few of the varieties of the exhibition—but if these do not show that we live in an age of improvement, I shall draw up a still more suprising catalogue.

POETRY.

AN OPPOSITION MACHINE.

I say Pete,did you read that poetry in th e Chronicle—that chap must be dreadful in love. 'Spose you brush out the hopper and we'll turn off a few,—there may not be as much love in them, perpaps, but the sentiment's the same you know.

Oh, promise me, Oh! promise me, that thou wilt be my bride.
When that is done I'll care no more my faults from you to hide—
But let a blush. a rosy blush, thy maiden cheeks adorn,
While I step down to Our House and there
I'll take a horn.

And let a smile. a sunny smile, upon upon thy lips be plying,
As little pigs in acore time, all through the woods are straying,
And if you come across them there, a snorting o-p-h they go,
And then they'll set their bristles up, just for to make a show.

There, stop! that's quite enough, for should Miss———see this may be she'll take a fancy to us, and ask us to be a regular contributor,—that you know Pete would be taxing our genius too much, as writing aint our natural gift. VITA.

'How beautiful it is,' said Simon, casting up his eyes like a fat turtle in a gust, 'to watch the trees, dripping with moisture, as it runs from leaf to leaf to leaf after a summer shower. Isn't it beautiful?'

'Can't say I like to see rain do that way, Simon—I never could bear to see any one run down a friend,' replied Ephraim. Simon thrust his hands deep into his pockets and sighed heavily.—[Rich. Star.

Ephraim and Simon took a wheelbarrow yesterday, for the purpose of viewing the city. Ike Tibbs acted as horse on the occasion, and wheeled them about, every where. Among other places they examined a lot of fine buildings, the farthest one being unoccupied. After looking at each and admiring them much, they reached the end building, when Simon cautiously knocked the ashes from his cigar, and observed to Ephraim, 'This is a handsome house very, but [puff] it is the last, and my back ache's like fun. Let's go back.'

'True, Simon, very true, this house is the last, but not leased, as you observe, said Ephraim, shifting his leg.

'He! he! he!' giggled Ike Tibbs, while Simon grinned a ghastly smile.

SCENE—LAWYER'S OFFICE.

'Mr. I've brought this ere bag, and I want a bushel of oats, just as quick as ever I can get 'em.'

'Oats! why my good fellow, I have no oats—if you want any LAW, I can attend to you.'

'No, I only wants a bushel of oats for my horses—that man over there said I could get fee-d here, but I sort o' reckon, mister, that this is rather the wrong pew—so I'll cut out. Good bye.'—[Ephraim's Scrap Book.

Simon went into a painter's studio, yesterday, to look at his pictures. The old man, in his simple way, laid his broad finger upon a fresh painted eye, and its brilliancy and beauty were gone forever. The poor old man stood aghast for a moment, when a rousing kick from the enraged artist brought him to his senses, and he was obliged to fly for dear life. The furious painter let fly at him, first one color tube, and then another, popping the old man accurately at each shot, and marking him with Naples' yellow Merrecienna, blue, brown, white, etc. Poor Simon saw Ephraim and rushed into his arms half dead with fright. O! Ephraim!' I'm most dead! I'm most dead!'

'Pooh! Simon! don't talk that way. You certainly had the best of the battle, for I see you came off with flying colores'

At this Simon smiled through his tears.

Ephraim—I'm so rejoiced—the Florida war is settled.

SHERWOOD'S ELECTRO MAGNETC REMEDIES FOR CHRONIC DISEASES of he class of Hypetrophy, including the forms of Scrofula, viz: Tubercula Consumption, Dyspepsia, Chronic Disease of the Liver, of the Heart of the Spleen, of the Kidneys, of the Spine, White Swellngs, Scrofulous Sore Eyes, Scald Head, King' Evil, Leucorrhœa, Chlorosis, Menorrhuga or Females complaints.

These are but different modifications of the same disease, arising from the same cause. Distinguished by the same diagnosis, and curable by the same remedies. Their common cause is an irregular action of the Electro-Galvanic forces in the system; they may all be detected by pressure upon the sides of the vertebræ and glands of the neck which elicits the Electro-Galvanic symptom, and they may be cured bythese Electro-magnetic remedies: The latter are accompanied by a compendious medical treatise, explaining the principles the discovery upon which they are founded, only stating the manner in which they are to be applied In this work Dr. Sherwood demonstrates the fact that every part of the human body, together with every particle of animate and inanimate matter is either in a negative or positive state of electricity and that every motion, in all matter, whether in the largest masses or in the smallest particles, is produced by the attracting and repelling forces of this universal principle. The morbid action e evhe produces disease of the organs or limbs. h whoudi to be occasioned by the undue preponderance of one of these forces in the system and his remedies restore health by subduing this irregular action of an equilibrium. By this means the very seeds of the disease are eradicated, and a permanent cure effected, even in cases where all hope of relief from other sources is abandoned. The Electro Magnetic remedies are the only preparations applicable to this prevailing class of diseases and they never disappoint the confidence reposed in them Thesymptoms of the class of diseases to which they are applicable can be discovered, under the directions contained in the work which accompanies than without the aid of a physician, and they can be used with perfect safety and success without dieting or inconvenience, or any other futher advice than this work affords.
